Brief Introduction:

Menotropin (also called human menopausal gonadotropin or HMG) is an active substance for the treatment of fertility disturbances.

It consists of gonadotropins that are extracted from the urine of postmenopausal women, usually luteinizing (LH) and follicle-stimulating hormone (FSH).

Human menopausal gonadotropin (HMG) have both FSH and LH activity, but the latter is primarily derived from the HCG component in postmenopausal urine, which is concentrated during purification (Lunenfeld, 2004). Occasionally, HCG is added to induce the desired level of LH-like biological activity (Lunenfeld, 2004). Currently, HMG are commercially available at FSH:LH ratio of 1:1.
