Brief Introduction:

A peptide is two or more amino acids joined together and is the building block of protein. Peptides fall into three main categories: signal peptides, carrier peptides, and those that inhibit nerve signals. Signal peptides, like palmitoyl tripeptide-1, act as messengers to cells, which trigger collagen synthesis, which then increases skin firmness.

Palmitoyl tripeptide-1 is a small three amino acid signal peptide with the amino sequence of glycine-histidine-lysine (GHK). GHK is attached to palmitic acid (a fatty acid) to increase its skin penetration and oil solubility.

Palmitoyl tripeptide-1 can greatly promote the production of skin collagen, make facial skin plump and give elasticity, increase skin water content and moisture retention, make skin soft and smooth to touch, brighten skin from the inside out and no longer dull.

Function:

1. Firms the skin and aids in collagen production

As we age, collagen in the skin breaks down into peptides, which send signals to skin cells, informing them to make more collagen to replace what was lost. Topical application of peptides increases this signalling, thereby increasing new collagen production.

2. Reduces the appearance of fine lines

By stimulating collagen production, peptides help to make the skin appear more plump and youthful.

3. Strengthens the skin barrier

Peptides increase cell activity and repair the skin's natural barrier, allowing it to retain water more efficiently and protect the body against foreign substances.

4. Locks in hydration

As you age, collagen production declines and over time, collagen level in the skin decreases. Collagen aids the skin in retaining moisture; hence, the loss of collagen also causes dehydration in the skin. Using collagen-stimulating peptides, such as palmitoyl tripeptide-1, thereby boost skin hydration by boosting collagen production.

5. Reduces inflammation

Antioxidants found in peptides help calm and soothe your skin, leading to less inflammation.

6. Smooths out complexion

Increased collagen also means clearer, more even skin, too.
