Brief Introduction:

Coluracetam just might be the next new nootropic to dominate the market of brain supplements in the coming years. Like many of the other most popular nootropics, Coluracetam is a Racetam compound derived from Piracetam.

It was invented in Japan and only first registered in 2005 by the Mitsubishi Tanabe Pharmaceutical Corporation. The patent has since been transferred to another company by the name of BrainCells Inc. and they have been primarily responsible for conducting testing.

While the medical community has expressed a lot of interest in this cognitive enhancement substance, nootropic users are also keenly interested in learning how this supplement will work for them.

Application:

Coluracetam enhances high affinity choline uptake (HACU) which is the rate limiting step of acetylcholine (ACh) synthesis, and is the only known choline uptake enhancer to currently exist. Studies have shown Coluracetam to improve learning impairment on a single oral dose given to rats which have been exposed to cholinergic neurotoxins. Subsequent studies have shown that it may induce long-lasting procognitive effects by changing the choline transporter regulation system.

Function:

One of the most exciting benefits of Coluracetam is possible long-term improvements in memory-impaired individuals. Since there only been a limited amount of human testing at this point, the animal experiments serve as the best evidence of possible benefits.

The administration of Coluracetam to rats has been observed to improve their memory using a commonly accepted maze test.

They also showed continued memory improvements even after the supplement had left their system, indicating some type of long-term effect.

The Phase 2A trials have also shown that this supplement may be effective in treating people who are suffering from MDD along with general anxiety disorder. These positive effects were shown in patients that had not seen any benefits from the use of other anti-depressants in the past.

A full third (36%) of the participants saw significant improvement with Coluracetam in the test used to assess depression levels. Many users also say that this supplement reduces stress and anxiety levels while promoting feelings of deep peace and contentment.

There are even some reports of this supplement helping to potentiate Nootropic-like effects (improved memory, enhanced cognition, better decision making, etc) and even vision improvements when used with other Racetams.
