Brief Introduction of Dsip Peptide

DSIP is a neuropeptide that influences diverse endocrine and physiological pathways involved in the central nervous system. DSIP is of key interest as it helps combat oxidative stress and normalizes myocardial contractility. The peptide is considered a potential target for the treatment of major depressive disorder.

Delta sleep-inducing peptide (DSIP) is a naturally occurring peptide of short length. The molecule's name came about due to it inducing sleep in rabbits and because it was first isolated from the brains of rats during slow-wave sleep (in 1977). Researchers have gradually explored its function in different endocrine and physiological roles. DSIP influences levels of corticotropin, inhibits the production of somatostatin, reduces stress, maintains normal blood pressure, changes sleep patterns, and also affects the perception of pain. The peptide has shown merit in its use in the future for the treatment of depression, cancer, and prevention of damage from free radicals.
