What Is GHRP 2 ?

GHRP-2 (Growth Hormone Releasing Hexapeptide) is a synthetic ghrelin analogue. Similar to ghrelin, it stimulates the release of endogenous growth hormone in the anterior pituitary.

To start to understand GHRP 2, first we must look at ghrelin. Ghrelin is a hormone that can be found in the stomach. It is produced and released by the stomach; but it has also been known to release in small amounts by the small intestines, brain, and pancreas. Deemed the "hunger hormone" one of its main functions is to stimulate appetite. By default, this then increases food intake and promotes fat storage. Of course, this is both a good thing and a bad thing. Of course, we all don't want to gain weight in the form of fat. However, this can also benefit you as you work out because you expend the fat as energy. So, what does this have to do with GHRP 2?

GHRP 2 is considered a synthetic agonist of ghrelin, meaning that it creates a physiological response when paired with a growth hormone receptor. In the case of GHRP 2, it aids in the secretion of growth hormone. The acronym GHRP quite literally translates to growth hormone releasing peptide.

Since GHRP 2 can bind to growth hormone secretagogue receptors it has been extensively studied for its abilities to help with growth hormone secretion as well as appetite and the consumption of food. The synthetic peptide itself consists of six amino acids and is a non-glycosylated polypeptide, in other words, it is a peptide that doesn't attach to glycans or proteins.
