What Is Epitalone

Epitalone (also marked as Epithalon) is a synthetic tetra-peptide with amino acid sequence Ala-Glu-Asp-Gly, molecular formula C14H22N4O9 and a molecular weight 390.35 g/mol. Epitalone is derived from Epithalamin (Epithalamine), a naturally occurring polypeptide in the body, which is produced in pineal gland. A very valuable and unique main property of Epitalone is its ability to increase telomerase activity in somatic cells. This helps cells reproduce telomeres, which are the essential "protective parts" of our DNA, which eventually results in a slowdown in the aging process.

In addition, scientific studies have also shown other great possible benefits of Epitalone as prevention of cancer and age-related diseases, restoration and normalization of melatonin levels, promotion of deeper sleep and strong anti-oxidant properties. Epitalone is patented by its discoverer Professor Khavinson and was approved for general use in Russia in 1990 and has since been used in gerontology. Many scientific studies and clinical trials of Epitalone have been conducted in both animals and humans, and no adverse side effects have ever been reported to date.
